,While some are immediately contemplating the privacy issues involved – a thorn Google will never be able to remove, it seems – the Google+ integration with other Google products so many are calling are starting to sprout. Now, thanks to Gmail engineer, Mark Striebeck, we now have knowledge about posts from Google+ appearing in Gmail. Now, this isn't a carbon copy email of a post being made in Google+, at least, not yet. No, this feature informs you about people you are following, offering notifications concerning recent posts they have contributed. In Striebeck's words: You can now see the most recent Google+ post that the sender of the email shared with you in the Gmail people widget – see screenshot below.,clarifies:As you can see, the email was sent from Bella Kazwell, another Gmail developer, to Striebeck. The circled area shows Kazwell's recent Google+ activity, although, in this case, the posts were made on Unicorn. What is " Unicorn, " you ask? Striebeck is already ahead of you:Oh, and before you ask, ' unicorn ' is what we nicknamed our internal Gmail test environment.,Logically, the non-test Gmail notifications would replace Unicorn with Google+. Over at, a point was made about potential privacy issues from the Gmail/Google+ notification service:Hopefully, those are only public posts or posts meant to be shared with the recipient or oh, boy another privacy stink coming.,Granted, if they are private posts, and the person receiving the notification is only on a " Limited " basis – meaning they can't see non-public Google+ posts, it won't matter if they are notified about recent activity or not, unless, of course, these notifications would allow the " Limited " access to posts they are not privy to.If that loophole is opened up by the new Gmail notification system, then yes, Google will have yet another privacy uproar on their hands.,Facebook is the king of the hill when it comes to social networks, but it faces growing competition from a couple of old foes. Google is rampantly trying to play catch up in the social networking space, while Twitter seems to have a new-found motivation for improvement. There is news out about Facebook's strategy (which interestingly enough is reminiscent of Google's overall strategy for the last decade: acquisitions, acquisitions, acquisitions.What should Facebook acquire to maintain its edge?.AcquisitionsA newout from Bloomberg says that Facebook is planning to make about 20 acquisitions this year, which would be twice as many as last year. This isn't a rumor. It's straight from Facebook's director of corporate development Vaughan Smith.The company has already made 13 acquisitions this year, according to Bloomberg. These include: Mac app maker Sofa, mobile app creator Snaptu, group chat company Beluga, mobile ad company Rel8tion, and iPad app maker Push Pop Press. Such acquisitions are line with Facebook's plans to focus on design and mobile, as Smith indicated in the report.Beyond AcquisitionsThere is a lot more to maintaining a solid user experience and keeping people engaged than just piling on the acquisitions. It's what is done with the acquisitions, and what features are added (or kept or removed) that keep people around. It's also partnerships and the developer ecosystem that make things interesting, fun or worthwhile.This week,that could very well pave the way for the future of movie-based entertainment on the social network. Other movie studios have experimented with Facebook movie rental, but Miramax, working directly with Facebook itself has come up with a whole new concept for this, including plans for purchasing and digital storage.Facebook is also expected to get more music-oriented with the help of a handful of partners. The recent U.S. launch of the popular Spotify may play a critical role in that.While Facebook faces plenty of obstacles on the competition front, it's also facing others on the legal front. And I'm not talking about the Winklevii or Paul Ceglia. The " like " button has essentially been. But that's a whole other story.The Google ThreatA couple months back, Google unveiled what might turn out to be Facebook's biggest rival to its core business of social networking. Though there have been reports of slowing growth, initial growth of the service has been huge compared to rivals Facebook and Twitter for the amount of time it's been out, and it's still in invitation-only mode. But yeah, yeah, yeah...we've talked about all of this plenty of times before.What we haven't talked about quite as much is Google's launch of games for Google+. Games keep a large amount of Facebook's users engaged, and there's no reason not to assume they will have a similar effect on Google+ users as well – especially considering that Google+ has the popular Angry Birds, and a handful of games from Zynga – the maker of some of the most popular titles on Facebook. You also have to keep in mind that Google's only going to keep integrating facets of Google+ with other Facets of the overall Google experience, which has a whole lot more users than Google+ itself. For example, Google also started adding Google+ posts to Google search results. On top of that, Google profiles (the backbone of any user's Google+ account) are only going to continue to be more visible in the search results. Think about how many people use Google search. Google is pushing its authorship markup to webmasters and content producers (). When this is used, authors of content show up with little images in the search results that stand out. When these are clicked, they go to that author's Google profile. Expect to see more and more of these as more people adopt this markup. Google also started including a video pages. Think about how many people watch videos on YouTube. Ok, don't even think about it. Just look at these numbers from comScore: Now think about how often people share YouTube videos. This feature lets people not only share the videos but watch them together. These are just a handful of some of the more recent things Google has been doing with Google+. Nevermind that they're pushing to and are (think about the possibilities). Oh, and Google's not too shy about acquisitions either. You may recall recent news of the proposed acquisition of Motorola Mobility. Facebook is putting more focus on mobile? The Twitter Threat Long before Google+ was even conceived of, there was another Facebook rival in town that went by the name of Twitter. While it has built its popularity up over the years, it was not until the return of co-founder Jack Dorsey earlier this year that the company really started kicking things up a notch. One of the most significant things that has happened since then is Twitter's addition of its own photo sharing feature. Then another major development occurred just this week, as, which give people a place to simply go and look at all of a user's pictures. If you think about Facebook or Google+, this seems like a basic feature of a successful social network. Photos are a big part of the experience. Yet, Twitter has managed to be as successful as it is without this kind of functionality. Now that users will have this kind of functionality, they will get a new dimension to their Twitter experience, and many will likely engage more with the service. As discussed in a recent article, it seems like the (and for some of them, perhaps a little less Facebook). I would not be surprised to see this new functionality continue to fuel that. Twitter has also given webmasters and businesses more reason to maintain a good Twitter presence.. All links over 20 characters are wrapped in Twitter's t.co URL shortener, whether they are posted on or any Twitter client. As a result, analytics programs will recognize URLs as coming from t.co as opposed to TweetDeck, or some other client (to TheNextWeb on that one). Another major, major thing Twitter has going for it is that it will be heavily integrated into iOS 5, the operating system that will power Apple's iPhones and iPads when its launched this fall. iOS 5 makes it even easier to tweet from your iPhone, iPad, or iPod touch. Sign in once in Settings, and suddenly you can tweet directly from Safari, Photos, Camera, YouTube, or Maps. Want to mention or @reply to a friend? Contacts applies your friends' Twitter usernames and profile pictures. So you can start typing a name and iOS 5 does the rest. You can even add a location to any tweet, no matter which app you're tweeting from. Right now, Facebook is still king. While it's true that Facebook does face growing competition for social networking eyeballs, it's not in any immediate danger of losing a substantial amount of its user base. Millions of people are still using Facebook every single day and often throughout the day. Considering that, webmasters and businesses should consider some other recent developments. How about this infographic from KISSmetrics, which looks at the: If you have Facebook apps, it's worth noting that Facebook last week put out its, which are worth a perusal. (even when sorted by most recent, without the user actually hiding people), and they're expected to.

It has already been spotted numerous times in testing. This shows posts roll in in realtime on the right side of the screen separate from the news feed itself. The point is, you may soon find that the visibility of your updates will go up dramatically. In the news feed itself, Facebook has already been. If two or more of your friends mention a certain brand in a post, that brand will get some special treatment in the news feed. More on that here. It's also worth noting just how much traffic the search engines are sending to Facebook Pages. Search Engine Land from PageLever indicating that 27% of referral traffic to Facebook Pages comes from Google. I wonder how much more we'll see those Google profiles stand out in Google results, especially once the brand pages roll out. Will that take away from brands' Facebook page traffic (which means Facebook's traffic)? Is Facebook in danger of losing its social network dominance?.., Prada bags are drooled over and lusted by almost every woman. Owning a Prada bag is like owning a piece of jewelry fit for royalty. After Mario Prada-the founder of Prada design the first piece of Prada bag, Prada has been the leading force of high fashion industry. Prada possesses an inborn sense of creativity and innovation which has produced numerous distinctive, stylish and eye-catching handbags. Prada bags are so excellent at setting newest, hottest and trendiest style that each piece of them can absolutely be called as master piece of the time. The designs of Prada bags are understated yet of high class. The style which Prada handbags pioneered is simple, understated and decent yet chic, elegant and cutting edge. With their sturdy simple designs, Prada gets the job done that makes bags focusing on edgy fashion, rather than adding too many additions to distract from its core fashion spirit. Uniquely chic design, and great versatility, Prada bags stand out as a classic and timeless fashion icon that outshines other contemporary brands. What's more, Innovation has always been the inner power of Prada. The ingenious Prada designers are very good at adding small adornment to turn a simple design into a sparkling fashion icon.
